In Gloria Anzaldua's essay "How to tame a wild Tongue" she mentioned about language mixing like how she uses to different language, which is most likely similar to all non-English speakers since it's not their first or main language. For me I also always translate the words to my own language in my thoughts before I write something on papers which is the similar idea like Gloria's mixing language.

And also, Gloria talks about how she uses the own language while talking with her family members, and she picked up standard and working-class English to communicate with her school, media and job-related places. Which is pretty much similar to all non-English speakers even for me since I also use my own language while talking with my family members and use English to communicate with places such as school's jobs etc.

And lastly In Gloria's essay she mentioned how she takes pride while using her own language and she wants to accept who she is while using her own language, she wants to feel free while using it. In my point of view that's very respectful towards your own language, and I also agree with her that people should not feel ashamed while using their own language because it's represent their different background and culture.
